In England and Wales, the Civil Evidence Act 1995, section 1, specifically allows for admission of 'hearsay' evidence; legislation also allows for 'hearsay' evidence to be used in criminal proceedings, which makes it possible for the accuser to induce friends or family to give false evidence in support of their accusations because, normally, it would be rejected by the presiding authority or judge. There are several examples where presiding authorities are not bound by the rules of evidence.

Evidence (law) - Wikipedia

Evidence in court proceedings. In any court case, the parties must produce evidence in support of their case – whether that is the claimant/prosecution or the defence. Without supporting evidence, the claim/prosecution or defence is highly likely to fail. Whilst witness evidence is critical in court proceedings, not all evidence produced is in fact admissible.
