1. Introduction. Spleen rupture is mostly caused by trauma. However, in some rare cases, it also occurs without obvious trauma, which is called atraumatic splenic rupture (ASR) or spontaneous splenic rupture. ASR is often life threatening due to the delay of diagnosis and treatment. ASR is uncommon, and little is known about its characteristics.

Specifically, we quintiled the universe by EBITDA/net debt ratios [1] and dubbed those with the highest coverage ratios "Durable" and those with the weakest financial structures "Fragile." The partitioning using these characteristics proved practical as there was substantial autocorrelation between margins, leverage, free cash flow yields and returns profiles across the cohorts.
