Archaeological and chemical evidence associated with ancient dye vats used for purple dyeings have provided new scientific perceptions regarding the various stages of the process of dyeing with the pigments extracted from Muricidae sea snails. These steps were described two millennia ago by Pliny the Elder in his encyclopedic treatise on the natural history known during the Roman Period, and also in a concise description of the dyeing of the related biblical blue-purple Tekhelet dye noted ...

This paper reviews briefly the early history of archaeological chemistry, concluding that it is to be traced back to Revolutionary France and the last decade of the 18th century. This period saw a unique combination of the perfection of gravimetric means of chemical analysis and an interest in the contents of the 'cabinets of curiosities' of the day, which included archaeological objects ...
