Justifying Civil Disobedience And Direct

Aquinas believes civil disobedience is unacceptable as it prevents the “unity in law and the common good” (p. 1822); he argues that disobedience in itself is unjust. The common good is disturbed when the rejection of a tyrannical government begins to cause division amongst citizens; while some citizens would want the ruling power to remain, others want to dethrone the tyrant (p. 1821-1822).

Aquinas on Justifying Civil Disobedience

Because civil disobedience will provoke tensions, sometimes violent ones, the first three stages must be completed to justify the fourth. Conscientious citizens should all practice the process of civil disobedience, even if they do not reach the fourth step, because, in so doing, they will have assessed the problems with their government and helped improve its integrity.
