climate impacts on human populations really begun to proliferate. Efforts to model the impact of climate change on migration remain in their infancy, owing in part to significant data constraints and the difficulty in disentangling a causal human/environment relationship from dynamic societal processes (Hugo et al. 2012; Brown 2008; Black 2001).

GCMs are the tools used to perform climate change experiments from which climate change scenarios (possible representations of how the climate will evolve) can be constructed. The design and structure of an individual GCM determines the climate change experiments that can be performed. These characteristics are limited by our scientific understanding of the climate system and by the available computing resources.

8: Modelling Climate Change

Climate models are based on well-documented physical processes to simulate the transfer of energy and materials through the climate system. Climate models, also known as general circulation models or GCMs, use mathematical equations to characterize how energy and matter interact in different parts of the ocean, atmosphere, land.
