In both animals and humans, infectious diseases are caused by microorganisms known as pathogens. Types of pathogen include: Fungi; Viruses; Parasites; Bacteria; Many pathogens are intrinsically able or have developed the ability to infect both animals and humans, and so may be transmitted between them (Figure 1).

11.1 How are animal and human diseases interconnected?

The most effective approach for research into human diseases is the clinical study, but this can be hampered by disease heterogeneity, marked individual differences and the difficulty in tracking the history and course of a disease. Additionally, no study should be performed on humans without preclinical assessments in non-human animals.
