As of Perl 5.6, Perl's regular expression engine is said to memoize the recursive backtracking search, which should, at some memory cost, keep the search from taking exponential amounts of time unless backreferences are being used. As the performance graph shows, the memoization is not complete: Perl's run time grows exponentially even though there are no backreferences in the expression.

Regular Expression Matching Can Be Simple And Fast

Oracle Regular Expression syntax has profound implications for Oracle tuning, especially in the area of indexing where indexes can be created on regular expressions, eliminating expensive full-table scans in-favor of fast index access. Regular expressions are extremely powerful for extracting facts from large text columns, especially the regexp_like syntax.

This crate can handle both untrusted regular expressions and untrusted search text. Untrusted regular expressions are handled by capping the size of a compiled regular expression. (See RegexBuilder::size_limit.) Without this, it would be trivial for an attacker to exhaust your system's memory with expressions like a{100}{100}{100}.
