Speciation And Genetic Drift Answer

There will always be genetic drift from one generation to the next, but continual, substantial genetic drift results in evolution. The smaller a population is the bigger the impact allele frequency changes have proportionally and this is why evolution often occurs more rapidly in smaller populations.

Peripatric speciation is a form of allopatric speciation that occurs when populations that have become isolated have very few individuals. Through this process, the population goes through a genetic bottleneck. Within the small sub-population, organisms which are able to survive within the new environment may carry genes that were rare within the main population but that cause a slight variation to behavior or morphology.

Speciation And Genetic Drift Answer Key

Speciation is the emergence of new, distinct species during the process of evolution. A single evolutionary lineage splits into two or more lineages by the changes in the genetic material of individuals by mutations, gene flow, genetic drift, and natural selection. Ultimately, the two lineages become incapable of interbreeding with each other.
