Patenting Genes

If a company holds a gene patent, they own sole rights to research and testing on that gene. So if a patient has a test done on that gene, the samples must be sent to the company owning the gene patent in order to be tested. This could cause delays in getting test results. Patenting your invention - GOV.UK

Gene patents may claim the isolated natural sequences of genes, the use of a natural sequence for purposes such as diagnostic testing, or a natural sequence that has been altered by adding a promoter or other changes to make it more useful. In the United States, patents on genes have only been granted on isolated gene sequences with known functions, and these patents cannot be applied to the naturally occurring genes in humans or any other naturally occurring organism. Examples

Biological patents in the United States - Wikipedia

Gene patents typically cover the clinical applications of mutation analysis, as well as the use of the gene sequences for the development of treatment. Under current patent law both in Europe and in the United States, genes can be patented “if their isolation from their natural environment involves a technical step.”⁴ This is obviously controversial.
