Jaume Prat reflects on the Western concept of immanence in history and explores the validity of the aesthetics of ruins in contemporary architecture. The Eastern concept of immanence is based on use. Its representative buildings, singularly its temples, conserve practically no original elements.

The maintenance routine is an interesting one; the different parts of the building are replaced before they are damaged to extend a cycle of maintenance endured by the apprenticeship of the builders.

For me, ruins are one of the main aesthetic interests of travel. They, of course, do belong in part to the aesthetics of art, since ruins were once buildings, or are buildings now-ruined. And some ruins are sculptures that still appear outdoors on a ruin site and not just in a museum, as well as mosaic floors and even fragments of wall paintings.
