The pigments, varnishes and other ingredients in the paint must dry to give a glossy finish in order to achieve the greatest vibrancy of colour. · Optimal Pigment Size. A crucial aspect to understand about dispersion of pigments is the size of the particles. Smaller particle size of pigment generally provides better transparency.

What Makes Pigment Dispersion Important in Paint Production?

Pigment dispersion requirements in the lab include good color development, a homogeneous paste, sufficient opacity or transparency and excellent stability as a paste and in a paint. The lab dispersion then must be scaled up to make paste batches in the paint plant. This often is difficult. The increase in volume changes shear and flow patterns and affects mixing. Velocities, shear stresses and shear rates often are less in the plant, sometimes much less, which can affect particle size and ...

Dispersion in the Paint Manufacturing Process - BYK

The dispersion of a pigment in liquid coatings, paints or inks to produce stable suspension, can be divided into the following three processes: Mechanisms in the dispersion process Pigment wetting : All of the air and moisture is displaced from the surface and between the particles of the pigment aggregates and agglomerates (clusters) and is replaced by the resin solution.

The 3 Stages of Pigment Dispersion
WETTING: The formulator introduces the solid pigments into the liquid phase. In this phase, air and moisture entrapped at the pigment surface are displaced to the grinding medium liquid phase. The pigment / air interfaces become pigment / liquid interface. To proceed, the liquid needs to wet the pigment surface.
