Here is the myth of multitasking. All of those examples are what we consider as multitasking. And, while it may appear to be an effective way to get more done, it’s actually the opposite. What is multitasking? “Multitasking is attempting to do or more things simultaneously,” explains Howie Jones in a previous Calendar article. “Unlike segmented amounts of time for a task, such as half an hour interval, multitasking is attempting to complete two or more things at the exact same time.”

The Myth of Multitasking - Calendar

When we think we are multitasking we are in fact context switching. For some simple tasks, we may be able to switch contexts very quickly. As tasks become more complex the cost of switching gets higher. As we get older we are likely to find this context switching even hard harder. Multitasking is bad. Multitasking prevents us from doing deep work.
