Human Infancy An Evolutionary Perspective

Originally published in 1974, this volume is primarily devoted to what is known about human infancy from an ethological, evolutionary viewpoint. Included are discussions of pan-specific traits, presumably shared by all infants; individual genetic variations on these behaviours (as judged by twin-studies); sex differences, presumably shared by infants of all ethnic groups; and genetically based ethnic differences.

This is truly an evolutionary perspective on human newborns and infants. Freedman reports on tests of temperament in newborns from different populations who are only a few hours old, implying that there are genetic bases for temperament that distinguish these different populations. These studies are truly unique.

Evolutionary developmental psychology is a research paradigm that applies the basic principles of evolution by natural selection, to understand the development of human behavior and cognition. It involves the study of both the genetic and environmental mechanisms that underlie the development of social and cognitive competencies, as well as the epigenetic processes that adapt these competencies to local conditions. EDP considers both the reliably developing, species-typical features of ontogeny,

His work looked at questions of difference in human development and explored the cultural and biological basis for some of those differences. He was the author of two books, Human Infancy: An Evolutionary Perspective (1974), and Human Sociobiology: A Holistic Approach (1980) and a co-author with D.B. Omark and F.F. Strayer of Dominance Relations (1980).

Daniel G. Freedman, 1927-2008

From an evolutionary perspective, weaning conflict may be considered the result of the cost of continued nursing to the mother, perhaps in terms of reduced ability to raise future offspring, exceeding the benefits to the mother in terms of increased survival of the current infant.
