Conditions necessary for the formation of hydrothermal mineral deposits include (1) presence of hot water to dissolve and transport minerals, (2) presence of interconnected openings in the rock to allow the solutions to move, (3) availability of sites for the deposits, and (4) chemical reaction that will result in deposition. Deposition can be caused by boiling, by a drop in temperature, by mixing with a cooler solution, or by chemical reactions between the solution and a reactive rock.

Hydrothermal mineral deposit | geology | Britannica

Hydrothermal mineral deposits are accumulations of valuable minerals which formed from hot waters circulating in Earth's crust through fractures. They eventually create rich-metallic fluids concentrated in a selected volume of rock, which become supersaturated and then precipitate ore minerals. In some occurrences, minerals can be extracted at a profit by mining. Discovery of mineral deposits consumes considerable time and resources and only about one in every one thousand prospects explored by
