In addition, older adults with mental health problems may experience them as physical problems such as lack of energy or trouble with memory and trouble concentrating. Many people mistake the symptoms of depression, anxiety, fears, and other mental health problems for the aging process itself. Unfortunately, many people think that confused thinking, irritability, depressed mood, and loss of energy are just signs that someone is getting older rather than signs that someone needs help.

Aging And Mental Health Issues ...

It is this such argument that can help to draw attention to marginalization and vulnerability in late life, and thus a greater prioritization of mental health and aging in social and health research. The persistent ideas that older people with mental health issues do not represent a large enough group to merit attention, and that older people do not experience mental health concerns beyond Alzheimer's disease and related dementias are dangerous notions with tangible consequences.
