It does acknowledge that the world exists via shared and linguistic conceptual meaning (e.g. the world at war). A 'new realist' account here argues that the world does not exist - 'stand out' from a separate domain or 'field of sense' as the author prefers - in a philosophical way, more precisely ontologically.

Why the World Does Not Exist:

Amazon.co.uk: Gabriel ...

Although we seem to be a negligible part of the cosmos, it is our consciousness that gives reality to it as a whole. On this picture, sometimes called the "participatory universe," reality is a self-sustaining causal loop: the world creates us, and we in turn create the world."
