Richard Dawkins and even some of his more philosophically astute atheist colleagues still borrow free will and reason to level attacks against the existence of God. But they can't do so successfully. This isn't to argue that all arguments for atheism fall short, but that all arguments for anything at all will fall short if atheism is true. In an atheistic universe, there's no self, no "you" or "me," just blind, impersonal forces and molecules crashing into each other at random.
