Difference ...

The water-fearing end of the surfactant is made up of hydrocarbon chains. A hydrocarbon is a molecule that is made of hydrogen and carbon. The chains love oil and grease and will try to stay away from water. The water-loving end is known as the hydrophilic end.

The Chemistry of Cleaning | The American Cleaning ...

Detergents and soaps are surfactants, short for surface-active agent.

Surfactants have a hydrophilic side of the molecule attaches to water, and a hydrophobic side of the molecule that avoids water. In the absence of oils, the hydrophobic side sticks out of the surface of the water drop.

Ingredients -- Detergents and Surfactants

Detergents are primarily surfactants, which could be produced easily from petrochemicals. Surfactants lower the surface tension of water, essentially making it 'wetter' so that it is less likely to stick to itself and more likely to interact with oil and grease.

Understanding How Detergents Actually Work

Anionic surfactants have a negatively charged head which gives them excellent cleaning properties and high sudsing potential. This complements the nonionic surfactants resistance to hard water deactivation. Tide and Wisk are two of the many different brands of detergents that use nonionic surfactants.
