Taliesin is more of a minor character, a Celtic bard who she eventually decides to marry after he becomes a Christian. I know that Christian monks came in droves to Britain after the Romans left, but Taliesin was a druid and there's no indication that he converted in any records I've found. It didn't make sense, quite frankly.

Taliesin / Merlin / Arthur (The Pendragon Cycle, #1-3)

The Pendragon Cycle has to be the most human and complex of all the Arthurian legend tales, linking the magic and demise of Atlantis to the birth and life of the English saviour/king. The depth of the character development is wonderful, though perhaps not to the taste of those who enjoy a more action-packed story.
