Costs - each franchisee finances their own franchise outlet. While the franchisee meets all the costs and collects the income, you receive franchise fees and royalties or a mark-up on products sold by the franchisee. Easier management - the franchisees also run their businesses therefore reducing the management demands placed on you.

Franchise your business - nibusinessinfo.co.uk
Similarities and Differences Between Partnerships and Franchises. While they operate on a completely different level, partnerships and franchises do share some similarities when it comes to business features. For example, most franchise agreements will define the royalties and licensing fees that franchises must pay to the franchisor. Partnerships do something similar by defining limited and general partners as well as how much profit each partner will earn once the business is profitable.

How Is a Franchise Different From a Partnership?

Choosing a franchise and being your own boss does sound tempting, but you are still quite dependant on the brand and their rules and regulations. On the other hand a partnership can be fruitful if all sides are on the same page, otherwise, it can be quite damaging to the entire business.
