Induction can be defined as an act that sets in motion some course of events. In terms of osteogenesis the "induction" process is defined as setting into motion the events of bone formation within tissue sites not associated with the bone formation event, i.e., muscle tissue not in the vicinity of skeletal bone or organs.

Bone formation by induction initiates by invocation of osteogenic soluble molecular signals of the transforming growth factor- β (TGF- β) superfamily; when combined with insoluble signals or substrata, the osteogenic soluble signals trigger the ripple-like cascade of cell differentiation into osteoblastic cell lines secreting bone matrix at site of surgical implantation.

The geometric induction of bone formation (Ripamonti et al. 1999; Ripamonti, 2000, 2006) is based on the manipulation of the geometric configuration of the biomimetic matrix that engineers regeneration by invocation of a sequence of molecular and cellular events recapitulated within the smart concavity of the substratum (Ripamonti, 2006; Ripamonti et al. 2006).

Abstract. The induction of bone formation starts by erecting scaffolds of smart biomimetic matrices acting as insoluble signals affecting the release of soluble osteogenic molecular signals. The cascade of bone differentiation by induction develops as a mosaic structure singly initiated by the osteogenic proteins of the transforming growth factor-beta (TGF-beta) supergene family.

Mechanically induced bone formation at the endocortical surface was calculated by subtracting formation indices of the left leg (control) from those of the right (loaded), and woven bone surface and area were measured at the periosteal surface. Endocortical bone formation was significantly increased by bending but not sham loading ($p < 0.05$).
