Firms Misallocation And Aggregate Productivity

Abstract. Firm heterogeneity and the allocation of resources across firms play a key role in determining aggregate productivity. Entry barriers and misallocation can substantially impact productivity, as evidenced in recent work. This article provides a unifying theoretical framework and a review of this literature.

This informational friction leads to a misallocation of factors across firms in an ex post sense, reducing aggregate productivity and output. 1 The size of this effect depends on the residual uncertainty at the time of the input choice, which in turn is a function of the volatility of the fundamental shocks and the quality of information at the firm level.

Information, Misallocation, and Aggregate Productivity ...

Misallocation, a key cause of productivity disparities across nations, is the result of many factors, making it difficult to isolate policy solutions. Living standards, as measured by gross domestic product (GDP) per capita in constant prices, differ greatly across nations. In 2014, for example, GDP per capita in the US was more than 50 times higher than it was in Malawi, more than 30 times higher than in Haiti, and almost 10 times as high as in India.

In Table 6, the estimates of aggregate productivity losses for SOEs are between 3.67% and 18.02%. The annual average rate is 6.74%, of which 3.24% is caused by labor misallocation and 3.5% by capital misallocation. The estimates of aggregate productivity losses for non-SOEs are much larger, varying from 9.52% to 47.76% with an average rate of 18.69%.

Misallocation and productivity - ScienceDirect

I establish that US public firms holding real estate have persistently lower levels of productivity than non-holders. Rising real estate values relax collateral constraints for companies that own real estate and allow them to expand production. Consequently, an increase in house prices reallocates capital and labor towards inefficient firms, with negative consequences for aggregate industry ...

Housing booms, reallocation and productivity

At the aggregate level, developing countries present low Total Factor Productivity (TFP) and export less than their size and geography would predict.¹ At the disaggregate level, they are characterized by small firm size and persistent within-industry misallocation.² This paper aims to connect these two sets of facts.

ABSTRACT We propose a theory linking imperfect information to resource misallocation and hence to aggregate productivity and output.

Information, Misallocation and Aggregate Productivity

Summary Focus Understanding the effects of house price booms on firm behaviour and the aggregate economy is a key concern for policy makers. On the one hand, rising real estate values relax firms' financial constraints, which could lead to economic expansion and higher efficiency. However, recent studies show that house price booms can depress productivity.
