There are two different ways in which a right to set off between different contracts can be claimed: a contractual right or an equitable right (this should not be confused with abatement, which is where sums are set off within the same contract). Under contract law the position is clear. Set-off between different contracts is only allowed where a clause in the contract specifically allows it to be done.

When the 14-day cooling period starts depends on whether the contract is for goods or a service. For goods purchased at a distance, the 14-day cooling period starts from the date you take ownership of the goods. You can cancel the goods at any time from the moment you place your order and up to 14 days from the date they arrived. For services purchased at a distance the 14-day cooling off period starts the day after you entered into the contract for the service.
