Neurologic Complications Of Critical Illness [PDF, EPUB EBOOK]

Acute and chronic neurologic complications can occur both in neurologic and nonneurologic critically ill patients, of which many are perceived as highly detrimental to survival and outcome. Survivors of critical illness are often left with neurologic and cognitive disabilities (Ortega-Gutierrez et al., 2009 , Desal et al., 2011), even without evident neurologic complications during the course of their ICU stay.

Prognosis of neurologic complications in critical illness ...

Neurologic complications of critical illness require extensive clinical and neurophysiologic evaluation to establish a reliable prognosis. Neurologic complications in hematopoietic stem cell transplant recipients are important causes of treatment-related morbidity and mortality.

Neurologic Complications Of Critical Illness

Conclusions: CNS/PNS complications were common in hospitalized COVID-19 patients, particularly in ICU patients, and often attributable to critical illness. In cases with COVID-19 as the primary cause for neurological disease, there were no signs of viral neurotropism, but laboratory changes suggested autoimmune-mediated mechanisms.
