It's by pure chance that I came to David Cannadine's recently published The Undivided Past: Humanity Beyond Our Differences in succession to Catalin Avramescu's An Intellectual History of Cannibalism, though they harmonise quite well. Both are concerned with categories and perceptions, both with the divisions created between 'civilization' and 'barbarism', both with notions of 'Us' and notions of 'Them.'

Publisher: University of Chicago Press. A wise and provocative call to re-examine the way we look at the past: not merely as the story of incessant conflict between groups but also of human solidarity throughout the ages. Investigating the six most salient categories of human identity, difference, and confrontation—religion, nation, class, gender, race, and civilization—David Cannadine questions just how determinative each of them has really

David Cannadine's title, with its reference to 'the undivided past', may seem to suggest some Platonic idea of a Rankean straw man who aspires to a consensual and

'definitive' history of a unitary past; but what we have here is something very different – something that might indeed be construed as a quite revolutionary gesture.
