Universally Preferable Behaviour A Rational

“Universally preferable behaviour” must be a valid concept, for five main reasons. The first is logical: if I argue against the proposition that universally preferable behaviour is valid, I have already shown my preference for truth over falsehood – as well as a preference for correcting those who speak falsely. Saying that there is no such thing as universally preferable behaviour is like shouting in someone’s ear that sound does not exist – it is innately self-contradictory.

First of all, UPB argues that universally preferable behavior exists; If you want to achieve X, then Y is the right thing to do and Z is the wrong thing to do (for all I care M is the slightly less good thing to do than Y, gradients are obviously possible). Like I said, this isn't very controversial. Every child understands this.
