"Econometrics is the science (and art) of processing information from limited and noisy data. Within econometrics, IEE is the sub-discipline of processing information from limited and noisy data with minimal a priori information on the data-generating process. In particular, IEE is a research that directly or indirectly builds on the foundations of Information Theory and the principle of Maximum Entropy (ME).

Entropy in information theory is directly analogous to the entropy in statistical thermodynamics.

Entropy has relevance to other areas of mathematics such as combinatorics. The definition can be derived from a set of axioms establishing that entropy should be a measure of how "surprising" the average outcome of a variable is.
