Pheromones And Animal Behaviour

Pheromones are the molecules used for communication between animals. A broader term for chemicals involved in animal communication is semio-chemical (from the Greek semeion sign) (Law & Regnier 1971). Strictly speaking, pheromones are a subclass of semiochemicals, used for communication within the species (intraspecific chemical signals).

How Animals Communicate Via Pheromones | American Scientist

John J. McGlone, PhD Pheromones are chemicals produced by one species that affects the physiology or behavior of animals of the same species. Pheromones assist in reproduction, feeding, social interactions and maternal-neonatal bonding in mammals. By definition and according to evolutionary theory, pheromones work within a species.
