Spatial conservation prioritization: Quantitative methods ...

Spatial conservation prioritization concerns the effective allocation of conservation action. Its stages include development of an ecologically based model of conservation value, data pre-processing, spatial prioritization analysis, and interpretation of results for conservation action. Here we investigate the details of each stage for analyses done using the Zonation prioritization framework.

Spatial conservation

prioritization is about identifying priority areas for biodiversity, as well as the allocation and scheduling of alternative conservation actions to inform decision-making. In other words, spatial conservation prioritization tries to answer the question of where, when, and how we act to efficiently meet conservation goals.

Prioritization of conservation areas. We used an algorithm based on rarity and complementarity implemented in the ResNet software package (Sarkar, Fuller, Aggarwal, Moffett, & Kelley, 2009) to design two sets of conservation areas for endemic birds in the SMBC. The algorithm required setting a target for each species, which is the percentage of the species' habitat that will be protected in the proposed conservation areas.

We introduce a novel approach to building corridors in spatial conservation prioritization. The underlying working principle is the use of a penalty structure in an iterative algorithm used for producing a spatial priority ranking. The penalty term aims to prevent loss or degradation of structural connections, or, equivalently, to promote to a higher rank landscape elements that are required ...
