No. Steel doors are comprised of either a polyurethane or polystyrene core with a steel skin over the top. A solid steel door would be prohibitively heavy and would most likely tear out the hinges. Steel between 16 and 24 gauge is used for the skin of the door. A wood frame, called a stile, surrounds the perimeter of the door. None of the polyurethane or polystyrene is visible on the edges of the door.

Steel stiffened hollow metal doors have steel channels that run the full height of the door and are spaced about 6" O.C. across the width of the door. They are spot welded to the faces and the gaps between the channels is filled with insulation.

5 Core Types for Hollow Metal Doors - Beacon

Solid core doors are molded doors, made from a single wood veneer on each side glued over a solid core of engineered or composite wood. Like solid wood doors, they can generally hold up to the wear-and-tear, as well as help to provide additional insulation in the winter months.

Interior Doors: Hollow Core vs. Solid Core vs. Solid Wood

Solid core wood doors. These are actually composites, made from two wood veneers on each side that are filled with varying infill materials. We should note that solid wood doors are not the same as solid core wood doors. The two are different and a fire inspector will be able to tell the difference in a single knock. The infill in a solid core wood door will create a more muffled sound, while a solid wood door will have a louder, more resonant knock.
