Efficacy of drug uptake depends on the chemical characteristics of the active substance, its solubility and membrane permeability. Also it is determined by the organism's ability to absorb pharmaceuticals by way of specific transport proteins or to excrete them. Since many pharmacologically active substances are poorly suited for oral intake, a decisive criterion for efficacy is its so-called bioavailability.

For reasons of convenience for the patient and compliance to the therapy, most drugs are administered orally. To keep the dose at the lowest possible level, high oral absorption and high bioavailability are prime properties to optimize in a new drug. Drug bioavailability is the outcome of a complex chain of events, and is among others influenced by the drug solubility, permeability through the gastrointestinal wall, and its first pass gut wall and liver metabolism. Excluding liver metabolism, all.
