When economists finally began looking at history in the late 1990s, they continued ignoring growth, searching instead for the variable that could explain Africa's chronic failures. Scholars argued that poor education, aid dependency, the slave trade or colonialisms caused the slow growth in the 20 th century, when in fact these phenomena were also correlated with high growth at various periods.

Macroeconomists working on Africa have got their analysis very wrong, argues Morten Jerven. In his new book, Africa: Why Economists get it wrong, Jerven argues that the study of Africa relies on flawed narratives and data. He questions many of the presuppositions made by popular economists to provide a revisionist account of African economic history.
