The use of chemical inhibitors for corrosion control against production fluids is widespread in the oil industry. But, the reliability of chemical injection valves and mandrels limit the applicability of this option for downhole corrosion control. However, the use of corrosion inhibitors is viable for protecting topside equipment and pipelines.

Corrosion Control - an overview | ScienceDirect Topics

Corrosion in the oil and gas industry is not a static phenomenon, and therefore its prevention presents numerous challenges. Fluid properties, pressures and temperatures are constantly changing, thereby making some traditional corrosion mitigation techniques less responsive than others. (Learn more in The Science behind Oil and Natural Gas Pipeline Corrosion and Coatings.)

Pitting Corrosion in Oil and Gas Wells and Pipelines

For decades, the oil and gas industry has viewed corrosion in storage systems as a major cause of releases and equipment failure. In order to protect the investments associated with building large fuel storage tanks, owners often included some method of corrosion control to extend the life of the tank or at least the tank bottom.

FeS is insoluble in water and oil and can form a protective layer on steel at low shear stress of fluid, therefore protecting it from further corrosion. As a result, the presence of sulfides in crude oil might decrease the rate of NAC, especially at low temperatures. On the other hand, the reproduced naphthenic acid keeps the corrosion happening.
