Process Cooling Applications. In process cooling, the temperature and flow of the liquid will depend on the need of that particular process in removing heat from the process. The temperature of the fluid can range from -20°F or -29°C. This will have to be determined during the design of the cooling processes in tandem with the equipment.

Process Cooling - Air Conditioning

The warm process water is pumped through a coil matrix. Air at ambient temperature is forced over the fins of the coil effecting a transfer of heat into the air. The now cooled water is pumped back through the water cooling system to the plastics process machinery.

Petroleum, Petrochemical and Natural Gas Industries–Air-Cooled Heat Exchangers Scope. This international standard gives requirements and recommendations for the design, materials, fabrication, inspection, testing, and preparation for shipment of air-cooled heat exchangers for use in the petroleum and natural gas industries. The standard is applicable to air-cooled heat exchangers with horizontal bundles, but the basic concepts also can be applied to other configurations.

5.2 General Unlike shell and tube exchangers, where the thermal and mechanical design are frequently done "in-house", it is not usual within GBH Enterprises to design an air cooled heat exchanger. The normal approach is to specify the required duty, and place the thermal and mechanical design out to tender with selected ACHE manufacturers.

Air Cooled Heat Exchanger Design - SlideShare

When operating in an environment with lower air pressure like high altitude or airplane cabins, the cooling capacity has to be derated compared to that of sea level. A rule-of-thumb formula $1 - (h/17500) = \text{derating factor}$. Where h is the height over sea level in meters. And the result is the factor that should be multiplied with the cooling capacity in [W] to get the cooling capacity at the specified height over sea level.

Air cooling - Wikipedia

Consequently, when further heat integration within the plant is not possible, it is now usual to reject heat directly to the atmosphere, and a large proportion of the process cooling in refineries and chemical plants takes place in Air Cooled Heat Exchangers (ACHEs). There is also increasing use of Air Cooled Condensers for power stations. The basic principles are the same but these are specialized items and are normally configured as an A-frame or "roof type".

What Is An Air Cooled Chiller & How Does It Work?

Air-cooled chillers have condensers that use ambient air to cool hot refrigerant. They are similar in construction to the radiator on a car or the outdoor portion of a home air conditioner. Refrigerant flows through a series of tubes mechanically assembled with an array of closely spaced fins.

Water-Cooled vs. Air-Cooled Chillers

Typically, an air-cooled exchanger for process use consists of a finned-tube bundle with rectangular box headers on both ends of the tubes. Cooling air is provided by one or more fans. Usually, the air blows upwards through a horizontal tube bundle.
