This ground-breaking book builds on the idea of 'light touch interventions' or 'nudges' proposed in Richard Thaler and Cass Sunstein's highly influential Nudge (2008). While recognising the power of this approach, it argues that an alternative also needs to be considered: a 'think' strategy that calls on citizens to decide their own priorities as part of a process of civic and democratic renewal.

ABSTRACT / EXCERPT. This chapter discusses an experiment on donating organs. It asks whether the nudge strategy of changing choice architecture can encourage people to agree to donate their organs after their death. It then outlines a second experiment testing whether a booklet alone or a booklet combined with a discussion (a think strategy) would cause people to be more willing to ...
