Osteopathy In Britain The First

Osteopathy came to Britain in 1913, when one of Still's early students, John Martin Littlejohn, returned to London to practice and with the aim of setting up 'a standard of osteopathic science, to show the public what the science is and to clinically demonstrate its efficiency'. He established the first osteopathic school in the country, the British School of Osteopathy, in 1917, and served as Dean of the School for 40 years.

Osteopathy in Britain The British School of Osteopathy (BSO) was set up in 1921 by a student of Dr Still's; Dr Martin Littlejohn, and became the sole training establishment until the 1950s. Whereas, in America, Osteopathy tended to become part of the medical mainstream, osteopaths were medical doctors becoming more like GPs and over time doing less actual osteopathy, in Britain Osteopathy has remained separate.

History of Osteopathy and training

The BSO did not share the same views, and the BOA eventually made some leeway with this ambition with the establishment of the London College of Osteopathic Medicine (LCOM) (London Bridge Osteopaths, 2013) in 1946, which saw shorter osteopathic courses being offered to medical professionals, and therefore, the professionals graduating from the courses became the first British-trained osteopaths to start practice.
