Abstract. This chapter describes a modeling methodology to provide the main characteristics of a simulation tool to analyze the steady state, transient operation, and control of steam generation processes, such as heat recovery steam generators (HRSG). The methodology includes a modular strategy that considers individual heat exchangers such as: economizers, evaporators, superheaters, drum tanks, and control systems.

Modeling of these reactors is a complex task since a system of nonlinear differential equations must be solved and many transport and chemical parameters should to be evaluated; in addition the diffusion of gas into the solid matrix is hard to model (Parisi and Laborde, 2001). Several authors have studied the steady-state modeling of catalytic methanol synthesis reactor at various level of complexity, but a few studies have been done on dynamic simulations and control of methanol reactor.
