Primary aluminium is transferred from the pots to the cast house, where it is then transformed into ingots of different shapes and sizes. Further, scrap metal may be re-melted and recast. Molten metal from the pots is transferred to a holding furnace where the temperature can be controlled and different alloys can be mixed.

Homogenisation of aluminium alloys is the high temperature heat treatment (450-600 °C) performed after casting and consists of three distinct steps; heat-up, soak and cooldown. This review considers the metallurgical importance of homogenisation and how it impacts on the further processing and final properties of some aluminium alloys, with emphasis on homogenisation of extrusion billet.

In this study two typical cast house layouts are examined. In one case, 22kg 99.85% aluminium remelt ingots are produced using chain conveyor ingot casting machines. In the second case, wrought alloy extrusion and rolling slab direct chill cast products are made. Both plants are sized at 500ktpa.
