Treadmill training for patients with Parkinson's disease

Common pathological gait patterns appear in patients after stroke 1, 2). Such gait patterns are characterized by increased double support duration on the paretic side and reduced swing phase duration, cadence, speed, and stride length 1). In particular, the asymmetric gait patterns in these patients result from the weakness of dorsiflexors and the spasticity of plantarflexors 2). Therefore, it is necessary priorly to figure out whether an increase of the dorsiflexors strength or a decrease ...
