The good news is that the SB-700 is capable of being used as a master or slave flash, BUT the SB-700 does not (I believe) have "commander" functionality built-in (The SB-900 does). If you have a higher-end dSLR, your camera probably has "Commander" functionality built-in so you are good to go. Sadly, the D5100 does not have this functionality.

Nikon SB-700 Speedlight Review — Daily Photography Tips

I just bought my first speedlight Nikon SB-700 for my Nikon D5100 (kit lens 18-105 mm VR). And I have inconsistent feelings... On one side I really like that flash but I'm little disappointed about the build quality. When I mount and lock the speedlight onto the camera, I can still little bit move with it. I mean, the lock is not too tight.

The manual says (on page C-1) you can't select the i-TTL modes on the SB-700 speedlight but you can do so by selecting spot metering (as opposed to center-weighted or matrix) on your camera (page C-2). I guess the metering mode nomenclature applies to Nikon cameras but it could work with other manufacturers' gear, too.

It offers nearly the same light output as its big brother while being imminently more portable. It's also much easier to use than the old sb-600's limited user interface. It also integrates well into a multi-light setup.
