The impact of time-sensitive networking on EtherNet/IP Time-sensitive networking (TSN) has its own gravitational pull, said Steve Zuponicic, technology manager at Rockwell Automation. "We think we're in charge of our own destiny, but TSN started as an audio-video bridging outside of our industry," he explained.

Abstract: The seven articles in this special section focus on time sensitive networking (TSN), an IEEE 802.1 standard. TSN makes it possible to carry data traffic of time-critical and/or mission- critical applications over a bridged Ethernet network shared by various kinds of applications having different Quality of Service (QoS) requirements, i.e., time and/or mission critical TSN traffic and non-TSN best effort traffic.

Time-Sensitive Networking Standards - IEEE Journals & Magazine

What is time-sensitive networking (TSN)? In its simplest form, TSN is the IEEE 802.1Q defined standard technology to provide deterministic messaging on standard Ethernet. TSN technology is centrally managed and delivers guarantees of delivery and minimized jitter using time scheduling for those real-time applications that require determinism.

Abstract: A number of companies and standards development organizations have, since 2000, been producing products and standards for "time-sensitive networks" to support real-time applications that require a) zero packet loss due to buffer congestion, b) extremely low packet loss due to equipment failure, and c) guaranteed upper bounds on end-to-end latency. Often, a robust capability for time synchronization to less than 1 μ s is also required.
