One of the challenges in a rapidly growing engineering organization is determining how your organization's productivity scales over time. Companies that grow quickly often face a slow down in output because of inefficiencies and communication challenges.

Engineering productivity is defined as a ratio of input to output. The inputs of engineering may be clearly defined, but measuring the outputs is elusive (Sacks, & Barak 2008). Various engineering productivity measurements have been used in previous research.

Value engineering analysis is a systematic process which organizations use every time they want to conduct a study of the product's function. The method seeks to know if the function of the product provides the value that the organization intends to give to its consumers. The objective of this method is to improve the value of the end product.
