A high-res image is 300 dpi (dots per inch). However, since vector images are not made up of dots but rather lines, vector images are high resolution by nature. High-res images are needed when printing and here's why. Have you ever seen a photo printed and it looks blurry or pixelated? That pixelation is caused when a low-res image (often 72 or 150 dpi) is used and is stretched to fit a larger area than the original images can accommodate.
