Since there are 9 elements in our list ([0] through [8]), attempting to access `my_list[9]` throws an `IndexError: list index out of range`, since it is actually trying to get the tenth element, and there isn't one. Python also allows you to index from the end of the list using a negative number, where `[-1]` returns the last element. This is super-useful since it means you don't have to programmatically find out the length of the iterable in order to work with elements at the end of it.
