Instead, Michael Cimino intended the deadly game to be a metaphor for America's involvement in South Vietnam. Cimino is quoted as saying that the "Russian roulette is a metaphor for what America was doing with its young people, sending them to a war in a foreign place." The metaphor is therefore a way of showing the ruthless, random, and ultimately deadly experience of the Vietnam War for a young American soldier, or at least how Cimino himself thought that the experience of a young soldier ...

Lisa: The Painful - A Deadly Game of Russian Roulette ...

Russian roulette is a deadly game of chance. Players sit around a table (usually numbering just two or three), and a single round is placed into the cylinder of a revolver (yes, a gun!). The player places the muzzle of the gun against their forehead (or temple), and pulls the trigger. If the gun does not go off, the next player does the same.
