Decentralization And Veiled Corruption Under

Similarly, much research on how decentralization affects corruption has taken place in democratic and/or law-based contexts. This has illuminated a debate about whether and when improved accountability occurs under centralization versus decentralization (Bardhan, 2002, Gerring and Thacker, 2004, Seabright, 1996). Yet non-law-based contexts also merit further independent attention as they may contain different dynamics, as I hope I have shown in this paper.

This paper shows why corruption is especially difficult to detect under China’s system of decentralized authoritarian rule, which I call a “rule of mandates.”. Local officials must pursue high priority political targets but have immense discretion over which laws to implement. A relative standard for corruption consequently arises since non-implementation of laws may be mandate-serving or may be corrupt; and determining which requires extra information on why non-implementation occurred.
