Group 3 elements like Al will form 3+ ions. So moving from Group 1 to Group 3 sees ions becoming smaller and more charged. In other words, the ions have a higher charge-density as we move across the period. And the metallic lattice will contain more electrons. So the attractions are getting stronger and the melting point should become higher.

1. Melting point increases for metals Na, Mg and Al. Strength of metallic bonds is related to valency. Across the period the valency increases (from valency 1 in sodium to valency 3 in aluminium) so the metal atoms can delocalise more electrons to form more positively charged cations and a bigger sea of delocalised electrons.
