Active Database Systems Triggers And This article is intended to illustrate how to use triggers in databases systems to enforce business rules and react to events in database applications thus supporting the Active databases principles. Business rules are kind of reactive constraints in the form of whenever events do action with a specification of what to do if certain event happens. The event is a request for the execution of some database operation such as delete or insert a row.

Triggers and Active Databases - C# Corner The four active rules (or triggers) R1, R2, R3, and R4 —corresponding to the above situation—can be specified in the notation of the Oracle DBMS as shown in Figure 26.2(a). Let us consider rule R1 to illustrate the syntax of creating triggers in Oracle. The CREATE TRIGGER statement specifies a trigger (or active rule) name Total_sal1 for R1.

A database trigger is special stored procedure that is run when specific actions occur within a database. Most triggers are defined to run when changes are made to a table's data. Triggers can be defined to run instead of or after DML (Data Manipulation Language) actions such as INSERT, UPDATE, and DELETE. Triggers help the database designer ensure certain actions, such as maintaining an audit file, are completed regardless of which program or user makes changes to the data.

What is a Database Trigger? - Essential SQL

An active database management system (ADBMS) is an event-driven system in which schema or data changes generate events monitored by active rules. Active database management systems are invoked by synchronous events generated by user or application programs as well as external asynchronous data change events such as a change in sensor value or time.
