Even before the state's admission to the Union in September 1850, California's Legislature passed a bill — ironically called the Act for the Government and Protection of Indians — which codified the Spanish practice of forcing California Indians into slavery, though it set a few token restrictions on the practice. As many as 10,000 California Indians, especially children, were kidnapped and sold into slavery before Emancipation in 1863.

Untold History: The Survival of California's Indians | KCET

Albert Hurtado has written a useful synthesis of the adaptation and survival of California Indians in the period from about 1819 to 1860. The author focuses on several important themes, including the evolution of Indian labor and the social and economic consequences of incorporation into an expanding market economy; the failure of ad hoc United ...
