Recognition And Treatment Of Psychiatric

Less than half of Americans who report a mental disorder during their lifetime have received treatment for that disorder. It is clear that mental disorders are insufficiently recognized, let alone treated. The authors of Recognition and Treatment of Psychiatric Disorders note correctly that primary care has become a de facto mental health system. The use of the term "system" is somewhat autistic when we recognize that the so-called system does not work for the mental disorders and may ...

The detection of high levels of psychological distress and the diagnosis of psychiatric disorders may be challenging in patients with COPD due to a number of factors: 1) the failure of patients and health care providers to recognize symptoms of anxiety or depression as psychological distress rather than symptoms of COPD, 2) the perception that depression and anxiety are “normal” reactions to having an incurable chronic disease rather than a marker of poor psychosocial adjustment,
